Is the law encroaching on rights? How labour activist’s case led to SC test

APURVA VISHWANATH
NEW DELHI, FEBRUARY 19

ON AUGUST 10, 1942, the British declared the Congress Working Committee, the All India Congress Committee and the four Provincial Congress Committees as “unlawful associations” under the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1908.

The colonial law allowed the arrest of members of an ‘unlawful association’, so declared by the provincial government.

In March 1950, the same law was invoked by the Congress government in Madras to declare the People’s Education Society, a cultural society, as an “unlawful association” for being a “danger to public peace” and “carrying on propaganda on behalf of the Communist Party”.

The society’s secretary, V G Row — a veteran trade unionist and co-founder of the renowned Row & Reddy, a Madras-based law firm that continues to champion the rights of workers — challenged the constitutionality of the law, first in the Madras HC and later in the SC, and argued that the ban infringed upon the fundamental rights conferred on him by the new Constitution.

On March 31, 1952, a four-judge bench of the SC led by then Chief Justice of India M Patanjali Sastri struck down the law.

The law to declare unlawful associations has appeared in several draconian avatars since the ruling — from the Terrorist and Disruptive Activities (Prevention) Act, 1987, to the Prevention of Terrorism Act of 2002 or the Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act, 1967 — but the VG Row ruling set a landmark precedent that a law must only impose “reasonable restrictions”. While doing so, the court introduced a test to determine if a law excessively limited citizens’ freedoms. The court said that “the nature of the right alleged to have been infringed, the underlying purpose of the restrictions, the extent and urgency of the evil sought to be remedied thereby, the disproportion of the imposition, the prevailing conditions at the time, should all enter into the judicial verdict” while determining reasonableness.

RELEVANCE NOW: The ruling lays the ground-work for what would become the “proportionality test”, the gold standard for ensuring laws that encroach on fundamental rights are narrowly tailored to suit their purpose. In 2017, the SC expanded on this test when recognising the fundamental right to privacy. The SC also invoked the test to strike down the Centre’s electoral bonds scheme in 2024, ruling that anonymous donations disproportionately affected the voters’ right to information.

The “test” that the court laid out would in later years evolve into the “structured proportionality test” which is now used to test legislation that encroach on fundamental rights. This test essentially requires the state to show that its action, restricting a fundamental right, is proportional to its goal.

Born in 1907, Vombatkere Gurunandan Row was the son of Justice Vombatkere Pandrang Row, an ICS officer, who was transferred briefly as a judge of the Madras HC. It was while he studied law that Row took to Communism, influenced by his uncle Sundar Bhat Kasargod. In 1931, Row was called to the Bar at Gray’s Inn, London, but the Barrister-at-law returned to practice in India. A few years later, he set up Row & Reddy. Row’s partner at the firm, ADV Reddy, left early on, when he became a magistrate in 1946 and later a judge of the Andhra Pradesh HC. Later, A Ramachandran joined the firm as the new partner, but the name on the board stayed put.

“Many of the early constitutional cases that the SC heard came from Madras, particularly from Row & Reddy,” says 88-year NGR Prasad, the managing partner at the firm.

The case challenging the preventive detention of Communist leader A K Gopalan — the first constitutional case that the SC would hear — was also the firm’s brief. It was Row who spotted M

K Nambyar, arguing a death row case in the Madras HC and had him argue for Gopalan. For the Gopalan case, Row is said to have worked on a large typewriter, drafting the brief that Nambyar would argue in the SC.

Speaking to The Indian Express, Row’s younger son Major General (retired) S G Vombatkere explains why the doyen didn’t argue the case himself. According to Vombatkere, early in Row’s career, he had lost his hearing as an adverse reaction to an anti-malaria drug, which meant he couldn’t argue in court.

In the State of Madras vs V G Row case, too, Row had assigned Nambyar before the Madras HC. While the HC decided in his favour, the Madras government filed an appeal before the SC, which eventually upheld the HC decision. Recalling the impact of the ruling on his life, Vombatkere says, “It is because of that case that I am what I am. Otherwise, my father would have been in jail, and my family would have broken up.”

In 2019, Vombatkere challenged the constitutional validity of the 2019 Aadhaar Ordinance and Regulations, and in 2021, he challenged another colonial law, Section 124A of the IPC, that criminalises sedition.

Row, who also headed the All India Bank Employees Association and other workers’ unions in the SBI, RBI and Lipton Tea, would meticulously read balance sheets to negotiate for workers. He was behind the enactment of the Tamil Nadu Shops and Establishment Act 1947. In the 1950s, the legislation to protect the rights of workers became a template for the rest of the country. “He occasionally smoked a cigar and liked his cigarettes but traded that for beedis to blend in with the workers he represented. I remember his simplicity and his trademark white shirt and white trousers,” says Prasad, the managing partner at Row & Reddy.

Senior advocate R Vaigai, who has worked at Row’s law firm, recalls arguing a labour rights case in 1990 that Row started in 1952.

“This was a case raising a demand for a bonus from the Madras Electricity Department. Years before the Payment of Bonus Act, 1965, was enacted, Row had formulated the right of workers to have a share in profits. But the government had refused to refer the dispute for adjudication, so Row argued that this reference cannot be denied on the state’s whim,” says Vaigai. While a single bench and a division bench of the Madras HC dismissed the case, Row & Reddy moved an appeal before the SC, where it won the case.

“By then, labour law had evolved to catch up with Row’s arguments and the case was referred back to the HC. I argued the matter in 1990 and won. However, most of the workers had retired or were dead. They would have got some ₹10 or 15 bonus, but it shows Row’s foresight,” she adds. The Payment of Bonus Act, mandating employers to pay bonuses to their employees was only introduced in 1965.

Row gave up his primary membership in Communist Party in 1964, but continued working for trade unions in courtrooms and outside.
